Community Resources For Families of High School Students with Disabilities

Nashville, Tennessee

When your child is first diagnosed with a disability, it can be a scary and overwhelming period, and each year brings new challenges. The high school years can be particularly hard to navigate as you start planning for your child's life after high school. The Center on Secondary Education for Students with Autism (CSESA) at Vanderbilt has compiled a community resource manual that provides families with useful disability and other resources in the Nashville area. These resources range from day programs to medical services and include sections at the end for Spanish-speaking families and families of students with specific disabilities.
